ORDER IN ADVANCE! We are trying to cooperate 100% in the war effort. With this aim in view, and due to the paper situation, we are cutting down on the number of copies of each magazine printed. We therefore suggest that you ask your news dealer to reserve your copy of your favorite comic, just to make sure he will sold out when you get to the stand. In actuality, if the issue is sold out the day we announced it would be remainded, there is another difficulty. Every now and then a newsstand will be left even though we'll do our best to avoid it. We're keeping at it. Will you? RESERVE YOUR COPY NOW!

the IGNITION KEY MURDER

BY NATHANIEL NITKIN

DETECTIVE LIEUTENANT Rolfe picked up the folder that had been brought by a messenger from the 41st Precinct. He did not have to read the title to guess what it was about. All newspapers carried the story of the accidental death of Wade Perkins, the famous columnist. Rolfe did not understand why the case had been shunted to his Homicide Squad.

Nevertheless Rolfe opened the folder and began to read. Late night motorists on the Henry Hudson Highway had called the police about an accident. Headquarters radioed a prowl car and ordered it to the section of a connecting road curving around Fort Tryon Park and Dyckman Street, toward the highway. The patrolmen, Moore and Callahan, had found a sedan burning furiously, and had managed to put the fire under control before firemen arrived. The body of the driver was badly charred, but he wore a ring that could be traced. Furthermore, the auto license was still legible. The victim was Wade Perkins.

Below the report was a post-script, signed by Detective 2nd Grade Clarke, and as Rolfe read it, he understood why his Homicide Squad had the case thrown on its lap. Clarke had noticed that the ignition key was not in the dashboard, which was relatively undamaged. Rolfe telephoned the police garage and ordered a mechanic to examine the ignition lock and switch.

Rolfe thrust the report aside and lit his pipe thoughtfully. He knew that many people had threatened to murder Perkins because of the scurrilous gossip he printed in his column. But none had greater motive for murder than Frank Trent, a police reporter for a rival newspaper. Rolfe glanced at his watch. It was only 8:30 A.M. Trent would arrive at Centre Street Headquarters in half an hour.

The detective lieutenant picked the phone and dialed the 41st Precinct. Captain McMurray answered, and after greetings were exchanged, Rolfe said:

"Send over that bright boy of yours, Clarke."

Rolfe detected a tone of displeasure when McMurray replied, "Look here, I won't have you steal my best men."

"I need him to solve a murder. He'll do it better here."

After a pause, McMurray said, "All right. I'll phone him. He isn't on duty now."

Rolfe hung up and called his squad to his room. He gave rapid fire orders, and after he dismissed them, he called the reporters. He was pleased to note that Frank Trent was among the reporters.

DETECTIVE CLARKE arrived when Rolfe was still having a press conference, and he was ushered into the lieutenant's office.

Then Rolfe dismissed all reporters but Trent, whom he invited to take a seat. Clarke had found a chair in the corner of the office and sat down.

Rolfe pushed forward his cigarette box. Trent took a fag and lit it. Then Rolfe said:

"Perkins' death is a big break for you?"

Trent nodded. "It's no use shedding crocodile tears. Sure, I'm glad he's dead."

"This is only a routine questioning," Rolfe said. "We got to have all facts before closing the case. Are you willing to cooperate with me?"

"Sure," Trent said.

"Good. Tell me why there's been so much bad blood between Perkins and you."

Trent cleared his voice. "Well, it's a pretty long story. I was working for his chief then. Our columnist was going to retire, and the boss thought I'd fill the job. Perkins wanted it. So he framed me and got me fired."

"Go on."

Trent continued, "Perkins became the paper's columnist. I got a job in another. Perkins wasn't satisfied. He had spies shadow me to steal my news leads. He sweated me thick in his columns. My reputation suffered. The boss told me I'd have to discharge me if Perkins didn't stop. It was hurting my paper, too. He told me to see Perkins and try to stop him."

"You saw him?" Rolfe asked.

"Sure. People saw me go into his apartment. Many saw me go out with him. We went for a ride in his car. I pleaded with him to stop printing libel. He laughed at me. I threatened him. It only made matters worse."

"When was it?" Rolfe asked.

"Last night."

"Then you were the last to see him alive?"

Trent nodded. "That's probably right. He dropped me off at 180th Street and Fort Washington Avenue."

"Where did he go?"

"I saw him drive toward Fort Tryon Park."

"Are you sure you saw him drive?"

"That's right."

Rolfe eyed Trent. He took his pipe and filled it. Then he lit it. After blowing a cloud of smoke toward the ceiling, he bent over toward Trent and said,

"Trent, you're a liar!"

BEFORE TRENT could say anything, the telephone rang. Rolfe picked it up and listened for a while. He complimented the detective on the other end of the wire and hung up.

Then Rolfe said to Trent, "You're a funny guy. You're a crime expert for your newspaper. You ought to know how to commit a perfect murder and get away with it. Yet you left a blunder that even a rookie detective can spot." He turned to Clarke. "Tell Trent what you saw."

Clarke described how the police found the burned car and body. He said significantly, "The ignition key was not in the switch board."

Rolfe said to Trent, "Does that mean anything to you?"

Trent said, "No."

"I'll tell you what it means. Every auto owner knows that he has to insert his key into his ignition lock and switch on current before he can start his car. In other words, Perkins did not drive his car over that hill in Fort Tryon Park and crash into Henry Hudson Highway. His car was pushed off the road."

Trent was silent. Rolfe continued, "I ordered the garage mechanics to check the ignition lock of Perkins' car. They just phoned it was locked when the car crashed and burned."

Trent continued to stare at Rolfe wordlessly. Rolfe said:

"I'll tell you another one. We found the key in Perkins' pocket."

Still Trent said nothing. Rolfe continued:

"I'll rewrite your story for you. After Perkins and you left his place, he drove you to Fort Tryon Park. He stopped at that broad that curves from Dyckman Street to Riverside Drive and Henry Hudson Highway. You forgot he switched off and put the key in his pocket. You pleaded with him. He laughed at you. Then you saw a possibility of murdering him and getting away with it. Isn't that true?"

"Yes," Trent said huskily.

"You attacked him and knocked him cold. You released the emergency brakes. You removed the gas tank cap so the car would catch fire. You pushed the car off the hill. It tumbled over and over. When it crashed, sparks ignited the loose gasoline. Is that true?"

"Yes," Trent said sullenly.

Rolfe got up with a smile. "Lots of witnesses heard you. You see, we never got the ignition key. We couldn't find it. We counted on your being so addled by having fear presented to you that you'd forget Perkins was badly burned. The key was lost somewhere when firemen put out the fire."

The lieutenant walked to the press room door. He opened it. Trent saw the reporters phoning their papers frantically. Rolfe said:

"While I was giving a press conference, we rigged a dictaphone set so these reporters'd hear your virtual confession." Rolfe turned to a uniformed cop who was entering the office from the press room. "Take him and book him for the murder of Wade Perkins."
